Nick Fahy

- I am an independent health policy consultant with my own company, Nick Fahy Consulting Ltd (see http://www.nickfahyconsulting.eu). In that role, I provide advice on a wide range of health policy issues and how to constructively engage with health policy discussions for a mix of clients, both public (in particular international organizations such as the World Health Organizations) and private (in particular pharmaceuticals companies). None of these so far involve advice on the health consequences of Brexit;
- I am still technically a member of staff of the European Commission, on long-term special leave (though still of course subject to the normal requirements of the Commission concerning obligations such as confidentiality and avoiding conflicts of interest, in accordance with the EU’s Staff Regulations);
- During the EU referendum campaign, I was an active campaigner to Remain;
- And finally, I am a member of the Labour party, although I have never held any party office, and I have always taken care to avoid any impact on my ability to provide politically neutral and credible advice (as set out in the Civil Service Code, for example).

• As part of the Jean Monnet programme, the European Commission paid a contribution of €42805 to The University of Sheffield towards to my salary and to support research activities (principally travel) during the period September 2009 – September 2012. See Ref: 2009-2835 Jean Monnet Ad Personam Chair: Enhancing Teaching, Learning & Research in EU Law.

• I am a member of the Advisory Board of Healthier In, a ‘grassroots campaign that continues to raise the voice of UK health professionals, carers, patients and researchers in the negotiations and policies following the EU referendum. We still believe that full membership of the EU is best for the UK’s health care and if ‘Brexit means Brexit’ then we must fight to work as closely as possible with the EU for effective health policy, data sharing and free movement of health workers and researchers’.
