

Parliamentary Art Collection and links to the transatlantic slave trade

In response to the Black Lives Matter movement, the Parliamentary Art Collection is being reviewed to identify depictions of individuals and activities related to the British slave trade and the use of forced labour of enslaved Africans and others in British colonies and beyond.

British involvement in the transatlantic slave trade began in 1562, and by the 1730s Britain was the biggest slave-trading nation in the world. The abolition movement in Britain, and the acts of resistance and rebellion by enslaved Africans in the colonies, led to the abolition of first the trade, and then the use of enslaved labour in British colonies by Acts of Parliament in 1807 and 1833. However, many British people continued to have direct financial gain from the trading and use of enslaved labour and indentured labour in the West Indies, America, India and elsewhere.

This document lists works of art owned by the Parliamentary Art Collection which are related to the trading and the use of forced labour of enslaved men, women and children in British colonies and beyond. This includes works of art depicting individuals that;

- supported slavery and/or the slave trade
- financially benefitted from the British slave trade or enslaved labour
- had close family ties to slavery and/or the slave trade

It also lists those who fought for the abolition of trading and the use of forced labour of enslaved peoples.

This document is the second release which lists works of art identified in the review so far. The review will continue to publish updated versions of this list quarterly, as new works are discovered through additional research. Additional works of art within the scope of this review have been identified in this second release of data, and can be found in the table below.

The Parliamentary Art Collection is working with the rigorous academic research published by institutions such as University College London and Historic England, cross-referencing against works of art in our collection. Additional research from the History of Parliament Trust has also been utilised during the review.

Where an individual has been listed in this document as having links to slavery and the slave trade, the source of this information has also been provided.

The Parliamentary Art Collection documents the history and work of Parliament, and includes works featuring 17th, 18th and 19th century parliamentarians. As many were wealthy landowners and businessmen, they or their families were often directly involved in, and profited from, the forced labour of enslaved peoples and the trading of those people. Today this is recognised as abhorrent. The intention of the Parliamentary Art Collection is not to venerate people who have supported and committed acts of atrocity, but to truthfully reflect the history of Parliament, our democracy and the people who played a part in it. The interpretation of these artworks is constantly under review. We will continue to explore ways to better explain and contextualise works in the Collection through our website and in other interpretive material.

The following list of artworks is not comprehensive, and this document will be updated as new research is undertaken, becomes available or acquisitions are made. There is no definitive list of MPs or Peers with close connections to the transatlantic trade, or those who had financial interests in the use of enslaved labour and indentured labour in the West Indies, America, India and elsewhere. However, they will be numerous, and some will be included in artworks on display in Parliament. There are also instances of Members whose views changed over their time in Parliament, for example those with economic interests in the use of enslaved peoples and the slave trade who later fought for abolition. Finally, this list of artworks does not include every instance where a figure may appear in a work of art, for example in the case of group portraits, but instead provides details for works where the subject is the sole or a major feature.

Not all works of art listed below are on display. Where works are on display, some are in areas accessible to the public, and others are in private areas.

¹ The History of Parliament Trust biography for Sir Robert Peel Senior, father of the Prime Minister Sir Robert Peel, outlines his links to the cotton trade, and his strong opposition to the abolition of slavery. The elder Peel helped secure a seat in the House of Commons for his son. The Younger Peel also inherited a fortune from his father.
